3. Programme Description

3.1 Overview

International Relations and Social Policy at the University of Lincoln gives students the opportunity to explore and acquire knowledge and understanding about the nature and function of global politics whilst relating this to the daily lives of individuals, the decisions of governments, intergovernmental organisations, non-state actors and other major organisations, at local, regional, national and global levels, in order to explore many of the key challenges facing the contemporary world.

Students are able to study and apply a variety of relevant issues and concepts in the social sciences, examine in depth the operation of institutions such as the United Nations, the European Union, and the work of national governments, such as in relation to education and health care. Consideration is also given to social 'problems', such as migration, employment and unemployment, inequalities in education and health, homelessness and poverty.

Staff in these areas have considerable research expertise which feeds into teaching, as evidenced, for example, by the wide variety of specialist modules. The appointment of new staff has further enabled the incorporation of their expertise into the curriculum, and the expansion of student choice through options.

The programme aims to produce graduates who are not only able to understand the contemporary world, but to contribute to it, including in employment, and in wider engagement with society.

The programme therefore delivers both: subject knowledge, for example, in relation to key concepts and ideas, groups and actors, and the operation of institutions; and a variety of transferable skills including, for example, information technology, group work, communication, presentation, problem solving, analytical, research and self-management skills.

3.2 Aims and Objectives

The BA (Hons) in International Relations and Social Policy aims to provide students with an education that:

- enables them to develop their critical and intellectual abilities and apply these to an understanding of the world in which they live;
- reflects some of the major debates and theories in international relations and social policy;
- reflects the interdisciplinary nature of the subjects;
- encourages the synergy between research and teaching through integrating research knowledge and experience in forms appropriate to teaching and learning;
- enables them to develop their critical and intellectual abilities and apply these to an understanding of the world in which they live;
- encourages the synergy between research and teaching through integrating research knowledge and experience in forms appropriate to teaching and learning.

The objectives of the programme are to:

- provide opportunities for students to obtain an understanding of the historical and contemporary, economic, social and political forces which are shaping international relationships and social developments;
- apply a number of concepts and theories relevant to the study of international relations and social policy;
- demonstrate an understanding of the theoretical and philosophical underpinnings of some of the main perspectives within international relations and social policy;

- encourage students to obtain a range of skills and qualities which will assist them in their undergraduate study of the subject and in subsequent study and/or employment;
- provide intellectual and academic challenges appropriate to undergraduate education, including theoretical as well as practical realms of study;
- enable students to evaluate differing interpretations and explanations of international and social developments;
- inculcate the philosophy of independent lifelong learning through the encouragement of qualities such as critical and analytical thinking;
- develop students' abilities to work independently and to develop self-reliance in their choice of topics and methods of investigation;
- allow students to demonstrate an awareness of the disciplines that contribute to the understanding of international relations and social policy and provide a framework in which students can use the tools of the linked disciplines in an integrated manner.

The International Relations and Social Policy joint degree, like the BA (Hons) Social Policy and the BA (Hons) International Relations, is designed around the premise that the two subjects have a distinct multidisciplinary element, which has informed past and current developments. These themes underpin the degree. They are not mutually exclusive and the acquisition of the basic and very closely linked academic theory and skills appropriate to each theme enables later modules to draw upon more than one theme.

QAA Subject Benchmark Statement(s):

The BA (Hons) International Relations and Social Policy responds to the United Kingdom QAA benchmark statements for the subject of Politics and International Relations and Social Policy and Administration. Benchmarking Analysis provides a detailed specification of the relationship between this programme's curriculum and the relevant QAA benchmarks.

Internal contexts

The BA (Hons) International Relations and Social Policy seeks to implement the University mission and strategy through providing students with an education and learning experience which will equip them to compete in the world of work, and by providing them with a range of transferable skills, knowledge and abilities which will enable them to build upon their University experience as lifelong learners. It does this by operating within the framework set by University policies and practices and by building on initiatives in teaching and learning, as well as staff research strengths in this and related areas. The subjects of Social Policy and International Relations are located in the School of Social and Political Sciences, part of the College of Social Science. The School possesses a strong staff team. This is reflected in a number of ways including the variety of specialisms, professional expertise and contacts with the academic community and in research. All staff teaching on the International Relations and Social Policy subjects possess relevant higher degrees and are active in research and publication. Staff who contribute to the programme have substantial teaching experience and expertise and have the capability to develop and adapt teaching materials and techniques as required. All staff are computer literate and regularly use IT skills in teaching and research and either have, or will have obtained a recognised teaching qualification by the 2015-16 academic year.

Considerable emphasis is placed on the employability agenda. The Social Engagement module provides students with the opportunity to interact with organisations outside the University, through for example, voluntary or paid work, or mentoring within a service organisation, and to reflect critically on the nature of this activity. We also organise alumni events where former students come and talk about their careers. Other relevant activities may include a study period abroad and placements. Such initiatives are designed to develop awareness of professional practice, employability and transferable skills.

External contexts:

The subjects of International Relations and Social Policy are two of the University's key social science provisions, reflecting strengths in both teaching and research. Staff teaching on the degree are active in the wider academic and professional communities with widespread participation in a range of activities associated with these. These include external examining, academic publication, responding to calls for evidence from select committees, editorial responsibilities, REF sub-panel membership, peer review, conference organisation and attendance, and involvement in relevant professional associations. Staff from both subject groups were submitted to REF2014.

Students graduating in the subject of International Relations and Social Policy

- have an effective understanding of the disciplines as required by the relevant QAA subject benchmarks;
- are qualified to progress onto postgraduate study and many have done so in the past;
- are well regarded outside the University with a number of students successfully undertaking postgraduate studies at other institutions, including the Universities of London (LSE), Warwick, Sheffield, Nottingham and Keele.

For details of each module contributing to the programme, please consult the module specification document.

5. Learning, Teaching and Assessment Strategies

5.1. Learning and Teaching Strategy

The teaching and learning strategy adopted within the BA (Hons) International Relations and Social Policy programme derives from a commitment to student-centred learning, drawing on the ethos of Student as Producer, with an emphasis on problem-solving, research and analytical skills. The range of teaching and learning methods is matched by a variety of modes of assessment, as shown in the module outlines.

There are a range of transferable skills that might be expected from International Relations and Social Policy graduates, including IT skills, analytical and critical abilities, presentation and group-work skills, awareness of their own strengths and weaknesses, ability to find and organise information, manage time and debate and negotiate alternative perspectives. These skills, together with the knowledge base provided by the study of International Relations and Social Policy, are valued by employers. The need to develop transferable skills, critical and theoretical abilities and provide a knowledge base, together have been taken into account in the development of individual modules and across the programme as a whole, and are reflected in the learning outcomes. At levels 1 and 2 the programme presents and develops skills in a context clearly applicable to the subject. The programme also draws upon the research strengths of staff to provide an underpinning for much of the teaching and learning experience, particularly at levels 2 and 3 where modules such as the Challenges of European Politics, Model United Nations, Issues and Ideas in Political Economy, the Politics of Global Health, Political Transformations of Russia and China, Understanding the City, Welfare Policy and Work, Youth Culture and Resistance, Community and Conflict 1 and 2, Understanding the Policy Process and Analysing the Policy Process, inter-alia, all benefit from being informed by the research specialisms of the teaching staff. It is enhanced through the overall commitment of the School 'to research what we teach, to teach what we research, and to research into our teaching'. The design of the programme clearly reflects the strong interdisciplinary nature of the School of Social and Political Sciences. Reflecting these strengths, the programme incorporates modules such as Key Social Science Concepts, Applying research and the Independent Study which are common to the School's family of undergraduate degree programmes. These interdisciplinary strengths are also evident in a range of optional modules.

Whilst we endeavour to run as many option modules as practically possible, it is inevitable that not all option choices will run in every academic year. This will be dependent upon a number of factors, including staff availability and numbers choosing particular modules. We will, however, inform students of whether or not modules are running as soon as possible, and certainly by the end of April in the preceding year for levels two and three.

The programme ensures compliance with the Framework for Higher Education Qualifications in the following ways:

- The International Relations and Social Policy degree offers a coherent programme of study involving appropriate levels, clear exit points and progression. The teaching, learning and assessment strategy reflects this with a balance between modules and across levels;
- Students studying the certificate level will have a sound knowledge of the basic concepts of international relations and social policy and of how to undertake critical analysis. They will be able to communicate effectively and will have the qualities needed for employment requiring the exercise of some personal responsibility;
- Students studying the intermediate level will have developed a sound understanding of the principles of international relations and social policy and will have learned to apply those principles more widely. Through this, they will have learned to evaluate the appropriateness of different approaches to solving problems. Their studies have an employability dimension enabling them to perform effectively through the enhancement of transferable skills across modules;

- An honours graduate will have developed an understanding of a complex body of knowledge, some of it at the boundaries of an academic discipline afforded by the involvement of staff research in the curriculum. Through this, graduates will have developed analytical techniques and problem solving skills that can be applied in many types of employment. They will be able to evaluate evidence, arguments and assumptions, to reach sound judgements, and to communicate effectively.

Where appropriate, students will be able to study modules from other subjects and from other Schools, such as the Lincoln School of Law and the School of Health & Social Care.

Studying abroad:

The School believes that an option to study overseas is a valuable educational opportunity for students. Provision of this opportunity supports the educational aims of the programme and enhances the distinctiveness of the International Relations and Social Policy degree at Lincoln. The option to take an additional year of study with an approved partner institution abroad has been an integral part of the International Relations provision at Lincoln since 1996.

The optional year abroad is intended to:

- Enable students to benefit from studying within a cross cultural environment;
- Expose students to a wider academic and cultural experience;
- Enhance their future employment opportunities;
- Increase their cultural and professional mobility.

Students will receive introductory information about the opportunity to study abroad during the first year induction programme and have the opportunity to indicate their interest in this option at the beginning of level two. This allows the students time to reflect upon the possibility of study abroad and to consider the implications of this choice for their financial situation and their personal circumstances. During semester B of level two, students start the application process to study at the partner institution and discuss their proposed programme of study with the Programme Leader (or their nominee). The programme for the period of overseas study will be drawn from suitable modules available from departments such as International Studies, Peace and Conflict Studies, Social Science, Social Policy, Sociology, History, Politics, Philosophy, Politics and Economics and World Languages and Cultures at partner institutions. The programme of study must be approved by the appropriate academic staff at both the University of Lincoln and the host institution. The opportunity to participate in the optional year abroad is dependent on a student's successful completion of level two assessments and their acceptance by the partner institution. During their period of study at the partner institution, students will be contacted by the Programme Leader (or their nominee) by phone and/or email to discuss their progress; in addition, appropriate staff at the host institution will be contacted as necessary to discuss the student's progress. Upon completion of their study period abroad, students return to Lincoln for their final level of study and receive a separate and distinctive transcript of their achievements and the programme followed, specifically related to this additional year of study abroad.

5.2. Assessment Strategy

A variety of modes of assessment are employed at each level, which are designed to test and enhance students' knowledge, skills and abilities as well as to prepare them for the demands of work. Assessments test students' attainments of learning outcomes that demonstrate and encourage not only the knowledge base, but also the development of transferable skills across the programme. Written communication skills are developed through essays, examinations, case studies and policy evaluations; oral communication skills through presentations and simulation participation; literature searching and review through essays, examinations critical reviews and reading journals; computer literacy skills through word-processing and use of electronic resources including the Internet and educational portal software.

The assessment map gives an indication of the scheduling and distribution of assessment modes within the programme. Details of module assessment strategies are included with each module specification.
